

Reforming the royal prerogative in Canada

Philippe Lagassé

Ottawa Workshop on Prerogative Power Reform

11 October 2019

Overview

- Three phases:
- First, independence in post-First World War era
 - Parliament and treaty/war powers as means of asserting Canadian autonomy.
 - Wanes as this autonomy is effectively assured post-Second World War.
- Second, 1990—2015
 - Populist calls for reform. Legal challenges. Parliamentary calls for change.
 - Largely executive-driven and benefiting the executive.
 - Party discipline and limited backbench influence.
 - Constitutional amending formula.
- Third, 2015-today
 - Executive-driven reforms may be more constraining.
 - New skepticism about prerogative power.

Prerogative and independence

- Post-First World War relationship with the Crown wrapped up in debate about autonomy.
- Equally true for the royal prerogative.
- William Lyon Mackenzie King:
 - Parliamentary scrutiny of treaties as of 1926 (coinciding with Cdn control of foreign policy coming out of Imperial Conference)
 - 'Parliament will decide' if Canada goes to war; distance from UK; national unity; Cdn autonomy.

Post-Second World War

- St-Laurent government:
 - Abandoned Commons consultation for military deployments
 - On and off since
- Pearson government:
 - Ending regular tabling of treaties that don't require legislation
- Independence and autonomy debate no longer pertinent

Post-1982

- Patriation of Constitution in 1982
 - Leaves prerogatives unaddressed
 - Amending formula: general, s41(a) Office of the Queen, Governor General, Lieutenant Governors, s44 and s45
- Reform movement in 1990s and early 2000s:
 - Parliamentary control of military deployments, treaties, fixed-date elections
 - Sense that Liberal party abusing these powers
- Litigation:
 - Turp and Black

Martin and Harper

- 'Democratic Deficit'
- Martin: Supreme Court appointee hearings
- Harper: Deployment votes, treaty policy, fixed-date elections, vice-regal appointments
- Keys:
 - None affected the prerogative in law or the executive's discretion (constitution/courts/Kyoto)
 - Served the executive's interests: laundering, vetting, ignoring
 - Confusion about the rules

Since 2015

- Military deployments and treaties: Liberals sticking with narrow practice and laundering
- Fixed-date elections: May be harder to ignore federally during majority parliaments
- Appointments: New Senate procedure, SCC back, vice-regal gone
- Prorogation: black cloud follows it; UKSC will likely have an impact
- NSICOP: questioning legitimacy of defence intelligence prerogative
 - Debate here will be an interesting testing ground for how the prerogative is understood today

Conclusion

- Prerogative not on the radar
- Executive generally drives reforms ensuring that their discretion is retained
- This is reinforced by the constitution and the courts
- However, certain practices may cement over time.
- As we've seen in the past, though, a determined government may choose to disregard well established practices.
